Jungle Fever is a thrilling ride into the wild world of Lynnie Zulu. Her bold tribal graphics - with a jazzy, psychedelic twist - lead us on an expedition into the unknown. Zulu's spontaneous and fluid style imprints her vivacious personality on all her work. Her connections with Tanzania also enable her to draw from a deep well of African creativity. For her first solo show, she has made spectacular use of the vibrant patterns and colours found in tropical rainforests and jungles. Her fascination with the individual also introduces us to a community of mysterious and charismatic characters. Faces magically emerge from the patterns and rhythms of their surroundings. Zulu's work transforms the space, conjuring up a world of exotic fantasy in a Victorian building in Notting Hill. For this event, she has worked closely with DJ and producer Nick Hadfield who will programme a live soundtrack to the art and space over 2 days. Expect to hear Afrobeat and Calypso - mixed with a fresh, electronic edge - harmonising perfectly with the art. Proceeds from the art sales will be donated to Kith & Kids (no. 1080972) who provide activities, opportunities and support for people with learning disabilities or autism.

Lynnie Zulu graduated from Kingston University in 2010. She has since exhibited in various group shows alongside artists such as Rob Ryan, Boris Hoppek and Paul Willoughby. Her work combines a tribal aesthetic with imagery inspired by fantasy and mysticism. Using brush and ink, she works with a primary colour palette that complements her bold, outlandish style. She has worked with a variety of clients, musicians and magazines including the London fashion label Fanny & Jessy. Zulu has been featured in i-D, Juxtapose and Vogue as well as numerous other cutting-edge media.

Something in the Attic is a pop-up gallery based in London. Established in 2012 by Cedric Bardawil, it provides a much-needed alternative to traditional art exhibitions by creating a relaxed, social ambience in which to showcase emerging talent. By exhibiting in unconventional settings and combining art with music, visitors are invited to experience the work in a truly immersive environment.
